ANOINTING OF THE SICK

The Virtue of Justice

Justice is both a complex and, in today's world, a very weighty issue. Justice is also connected to the concept of rights. From the ancient Greek philosophers until modern time, people have written volumes on the ideas of justice and rights. I could not hope to be comprehensive in a short column, but I will try to outline its basic principles, hopefully giving a helpful approach we can use to address this important issue. It should be noted that the Church believes that the virtue of justice is the foundation of all discussion on justice.

As always, we shall begin with the definition of justice and proceed from there. Most definitions of justice are deceptively simple for such a complex idea. The Catechism gives a version of the classic definition of Justice, "Justice is the moral virtue that consists in the constant and firm will to give their due to God and neighbor." (CCC 1087) Since virtue requires the "constant and firm" will to live out the virtue, one can only possess the particular virtue if one actually lives it out on a regular basis. However, it is possible that one can perform a virtuous act in a given situation without necessarily possessing the virtue. Ultimately, it is our job to develop the virtues through their practice in cooperation with God's grace so that they can become part of us, making it easier for us to follow the greatest commandment, "to love God above all things and our neighbor as ourselves."

But back to justice. What does it mean to give a person his "due", that is, what he deserves? It's not always easy to see, that's for sure. If you would allow me to bypass the theological and philosophical discussion and get right to the answer, what is "due" to a person is due by reason of creation. Justice comes from our basic human nature and dignity as God has created us. This is because every external act performed by a person has some sort of social consequence. One way of looking at justice is to do one's duty towards another. Another way of putting it, being "just" is to recognize and treat someone according to his or her human dignity. While it's easy to follow the norms of justice when it is based on agreements, laws, promises, treaties, etc., other times it is difficult and this is where the aspect of human dignity comes in. For example, if you agree to buy a neighbor's car for an agreed upon a price. You give your neighbor the money, you neighbor gives you the car. Fair and square, justice done. On the other hand, we know an employer should pay employees a fair and living wage while at the same time the employees should work diligently for the time allotted. But what if they don't agree on what is fair? Employers may try to pay employees less than the employees think they deserve while the employees may work less diligently than the employers think they should, bringing on conflict.

While we can't individually solve all of the injustice we see around us, we can make sure we ourselves are being just towards others. Usually it just takes a bit of thought and honesty about the situation. As far back as the Greek philosophers who wrote about justice, there has always been an understanding that the greater harm comes to the person who commits injustice rather than the victim of it. While the person who commits injustice may be causing harm to a person by violating someone's human dignity he or she is actually destroying his or her own human dignity in the process.

In the end, if we remember the second part of the Great Commandment "Love your neighbor as yourself" we should be pretty much on the path of justice by giving to other what is due to them and treating them according to their God given human dignity.

God bless you,
Father Joseph Byerley
